CHAPTER XX. lesson still was not complete. I yet had something to learn of boxing at long range, I yet had something to learn of these American middleweights. I endowed Klaus with greater ability than that possessed by other middleweights, and as soon as the humiliation of my defeat bad worn from my heart and my aching body had recovered somewhat I again began tooking for matches, believing that i still had the chance to ascend higher in my profession.

boxing at long range.

The change surprised and mystified my antagonist. Himself a noted boxer at long-range, as well as a furrican infighter, was no easy mark for my fists. I can assure you that he was landing hard and often. He used a fearful right uppercut that seemed as though it would lift my head from my neck, but still I knew I was gaining in points and felt that I was gaining along very nicely.

We fought at a furious pace.

The gushing blood from my mouth had horrified Descamps. He was certain that I must be desperately ill after such a happening, and he would not hear of my fighting after the Dieppe affair until October. I had lought I haus in June. About this time a new reason for exuberance ontered into the affair, for the judges of my bour with Klaus told me that had not Descamps disqualified me by taping into the ring I probably would have been declared the winner on points. This I have doubted, for I believe Klaus was whipping me very believe Klaus was whipping me very licely a bester wise. The first of the Gients' runs.

Near the day of the bout I was still over the day of the bout I was still over the weight, and rather than enter the ring overweight I denied myself all food and water for nearly two days and then just did get Papks, perhaps without intention. Papke, perhaps without intention, was a most pretentious individual in the ring, but out of it a more pleasant, gentlemanty and home-loving than never lived. He played with this child constantly and was devoted to his wife.

I have heard it said that Jack Johnson was a past master at sarcashie comment when in the ring, but at his best or worst he could not have been more tanishing than Papke. He had me infuriated early in our bout and his scorn of me almost drove me to screams. I did not know much English in those days. If I had I might have been in a worse plight, but I do know that he called ane many shocking names and said aunting things all the while. His eyes and the expression of his face would have proved that with no assurtance. His lip curied as he gazed at me. There was the utmost constituted. There was the utmost constituted as he looked upon me. I was a "guy," a "boob," a "stiff," a "simp" and anything but Georges Carpentier, a fighter.

I heard him say, knowing that much English, that if "this French icid couldn't beat Klaus, what does he expect to do with me?"

The taunts continued as he sat in an corner drawing on his gloves.

He would make a remark about me to his seconds and then turn toward me and grin.

camps, for which he chided me and I recorted hotly.
That was not unsportsmanlike of Papke. It was his method of fighting, and a method which I have no doubt is condened in the United States. In France we would not think of it and therefore would not do if. Now I would not be worried. At that time I

It did not improve my temper for him to speak thus, so I fought fast and furious. Papke, a master at inhibiting is was Klaus, plunged at me hanging away at my mid-section, and all the while I was striving to get to him. The bell ended the round while I was still in a rage.

It was only by a superlative effort that I was able to conquer the demon that was burning my heart out with singer toward this offensive ancerean. But Descamps dilated on the evils of losing one's temper and
